ARGUMENT.

ACT I.

The Act opens in a square in Paris, showing the house of Nicole, a glover, whose wife entertains a weakness for La Rose, a sergeant in the Prince de Conti's corps, and who himself is desirous of being in the good graces of Friquette, a florist. The Prince de Conti is a student of the Collège d'Harcourt. Angelique, the daughter of Nicole, loves Gregoire, the apprentice, and the opening scene is devoted to their amour. Madame Nicole has planned a pic-nic at the Prés St. Gervais, a sort of tea-garden outside Paris, whither she has asked La Rose and two of his friends, and where Nicole expects Friquette. Conti issuing from college with his preceptor, M. Harpin, head of the Dons (a lively contingent of tutors), is so enticed by the simple joy of the promised pic-nic that he determines to run away from his preceptor, and the scene closes with a general movement towards the Prés St. Gervais.

ACT II.

THE PRÉS ST. GERVAIS.—The Nicole family at their pic-nic. La Rose and his friends, much to Nicole's annoyance, join them. Conti, running away, alights upon the pic-nic, and his aristocratic manners move the mirth of the bourgeois. He begins to think that he is not so infallible as his tutor has assured him he is. Friquette joins the circle, and rebukes Conti for his slighting opinion of her. While still in amazement at his ill-success, Conti perceives his tutor Harpin, who resorts (with other preceptors) to the Prés St. Gervais for a little relaxation. Angelique and Gregoire, making love, are surprised by the Nicole family, and Conti again perceives his uselessness; but in attempting once more to pursue Friquette, he stumbles against La Rose, who goads him to a duel, not knowing that Conti is his Colonel.

ACT III.

Another part of the Prés St. Gervais. Here the duel between La Rose and Conti takes place, in which Conti is wounded, and the hypocrisy of Harpin is discovered. Conti now begins to gain some common sense, and apologising to the Nicole family, he endeavours to settle the various disputes raging in their household. His knowledge of the double intrigue of M. and Mad. Nicole enables him to obtain their consent to the marriage of Gregoire and Angelique, and announcing himself as the Prince de Conti, he heads the regiment, and the act closes with his conversion to good sense and a general jollity.
